My dear nephew

Your letter came to-day which should have reached me the day before my reply made your withdrawal from a correspondence which I have been looking forward to so long. I do not think you have the right view of matters, and I am convinced you that I am right and also have your qualifications. Let me tell you that the individual in question read my last letter to you before I sent it, and made an objection to it whatever. I did it on purpose.

To see if she would object to any thing I wrote, and the only thing she lacked against it was why I told you she would give you her picture. Now of the love made the least objection to any sentiment of opinion. I advanced I should not have sent it, and told her to do as the time. If I had not been in such haste to get it to the train, I should have written on it endorsed by E. I am very sorry now that I didn't do it as I might have had done weight in making a close

I am very well convinced that she did not intend you to construe her letter as a refusal of your hand, by no means. On the contrary, she told me she could not discard you, although at the same time, she could not marry her mind to marry, and also that you are the only one she had ever seen, that she would marry, provided she could even obtain her consent to the bonds of matrimony. Again, I think you will remain his very unhappy as well as yourself by the course you take, you have almost determined to marry. I am unhappy about you-I do, and I know that you deserve the love of the noblest and the best. If she does not love you, I doubt that she will ever love anybody else. She thinks you are too good for her, and says she could not bear the loss. I am well versed in girls like her; they are the opposite of you, sir, in every respect.
The talk to me very freely on the subject; says she loves you, but whether it is the kind of affection she thinks have you ever known, and wishes she is willing to take her destiny, she is not fully determined, and she cannot decide. But when she does, she cannot accept the hand of any one in accordance with
